

B.C. Trespass Act
 This guide is prepared by the Safe Streets Coalition to assist people in understanding how the new amendments to the B.C. Trespass Act may be applied when dealing with problem activities on urban private property. You should consult your own legal counsel for advice before taking any action or deciding on policy. For more specific procedures please refer to the Unwanted Activity on Premises (UWAP) guide on the website below.
 Please refer to:
www.safestreetscoalition.com

- Related Acts
- B.C. Trespass Act
 - Workers Compensation Act
 - Personal Information Protection Act
 - Criminal Code of Canada
 - Occupiers Liability Act
 - Human Rights Act

In most cases the occupier or security will ask them to stop or leave and this will solve the current concern.

In chronic cases, or where the person refuses, the occupier or authorized person (e.g. security) may issue a notice to cease the activity or a notice prohibiting the person from the premises.

Once all reasonable steps have been taken and documented, or if the person is known to be violent, police should be called to handle the incident.

Police options include warning, ticketing, a notice to appear in court, arrest and/or removal from the premises

